CHAPTER 1: The Boundary

The rain in District 9 was a relentless grey sheet. Detective Yuto sat in his modified SUV, tapping a rhythm on his steering wheel. Beside him, leaning against the door with his muddy boots on the dashboard, was Hiro.

"Get your feet off the leather, Hiro. I didn't spend three hours detailing this car for you to treat it like a dive bar floor," Yuto snapped, swatting at Hiro's legs.

"Oh, relax, Princess," Hiro smirked, not moving an inch. "Maybe if you drove faster than a grandmother going to Sunday service, the mud wouldn't have time to dry. My bike is half as expensive and twice as fast."

"Your bike is a deathtrap with two wheels and a loud engine. It suits your personality—annoying and likely to crash."

"At least I can walk into a crime scene without needing a ramp, Yuto."

The air went cold. It was the kind of jab that would have ended a friendship for anyone else, but for them, it was Tuesday. Yuto narrowed his eyes. "At least I use my brain for something other than holding my ears apart. Now, get out. The body is twenty yards ahead, and the 'border' is right between its legs. Don't trip over your own ego on the way there."

The Ghost in the Dark

The investigation led them to the derelict shipyard. After an hour of bickering over which floor to check first, they split up. Yuto navigated the lower catwalks, his chair humming quietly.

A sudden, violent jerk threw him forward. A thick steel cable, rigged across the shadows, had snared his wheels. Before he could reach for his radio, a heavy blow struck the back of his head.

When Yuto's vision cleared, he was on the cold, oil-slicked floor. His wheelchair—his legs, his freedom—was a crumpled wreck ten feet away, its axles snapped. He was crawling, his fingernails digging into the grit of the concrete, dragging his dead weight through the dark.

A pair of heavy work boots appeared in front of his face.

"You haven't changed, Detective," a voice rasped. "Still crawling. Still pathetic."

Yuto looked up. The man standing over him wasn't just a suspect. The scar running down the man's neck was one Yuto had seen every night in his nightmares.

"Kageyama," Yuto whispered, his voice trembling. "You... you were supposed to be dead. The warehouse fire..."

"I survived. You didn't," Kageyama sneered, kneeling to grab Yuto by the hair, forcing him to look at the twisted rebar sticking out of a nearby pillar. "I remember the sound your spine made when that beam fell. Snap. Like a dry twig. I've come back to finish the job."

The realization shattered Yuto. The man who had taken his legs, his career, and his peace of mind was right here, and Yuto was helpless on the floor. His morale didn't just break; it evaporated. He stopped fighting. He stopped crawling. His arms gave out, and he pressed his face against the cold cement.

He closed his eyes. In the darkness of his mind, he didn't see the department or his awards. He saw Hiro's mocking grin. He heard Hiro's annoying laugh. He realized, with a pang of terror and longing, that he didn't want to die before he could insult Hiro one last time.

Hiro... please.

The Rescue

"Get your hands off him!"

The roar echoed through the shipyard. A gunshot rang out, striking the metal pillar inches from Kageyama's head. Hiro charged out of the shadows like a hurricane, his usual smugness replaced by a mask of pure, unadulterated rage.

Kageyama didn't have time to react before Hiro's shoulder slammed into him, tackling him off the platform into the dark water below.

The silence that followed was heavy. Yuto lay still, trembling, his eyes still tightly shut, waiting for the final blow.

"Hey. Hey, Princess. Look at me."

A hand, surprisingly warm and gentle, cupped Yuto's cheek. Yuto opened his eyes. Hiro was kneeling in the oil and grime, his clothes torn, his face frantic. For the first time, there was no joke in Hiro's eyes.

Yuto stared up at his rival, tears finally breaking free and tracking through the dirt on his face. He reached out, his fingers trembling as he gripped Hiro's jacket, pulling him closer just to feel the reality of him.

"You're late," Yuto choked out, his voice cracking.

"I know," Hiro whispered, his thumb brushing away a tear. He didn't pull away. He didn't make a joke. He just held Yuto's head against his chest, shielding him from the sight of the broken chair. "I've got you. You're okay."

The Aftermath

Hours later, the shipyard was swarming with blue lights. Kageyama had been fished out of the water, alive but broken.

Yuto sat in the back of an ambulance, wrapped in a shock blanket. Hiro stood by the doors, refusing to let the paramedics close them. He was staring at Yuto with a look that was hard to decipher—guilt, relief, and something much deeper, something that made Yuto's heart ache in a way his legs never could.

"Hiro," Yuto called out softly.

Hiro stepped closer, his hand hovering near Yuto's knee before he pulled it back, as if afraid to touch something so fragile. "Yeah?"

"Why did you come back? You were supposed to be at the perimeter."

Hiro looked away, his jaw tight. "I heard you stop talking over the comms. The silence was... it was too loud." He looked back at Yuto, his eyes searching. "Don't ever do that again. I don't know who I'm supposed to beat if you're not there."

The "rivalry" felt like a thin veil now, one that was dangerously close to tearing. Yuto reached out, his hand catching Hiro's sleeve. They stayed like that—connected by a scrap of fabric and a thousand unsaid words—while the sirens wailed into the night.

Chapter 2: Sugar and Steel

The Uninvited Guest

Three days after the shipyard, Yuto was in his apartment, the silence finally beginning to feel heavy. He was staring at a new, sleek black wheelchair—a gift from the department, though he suspected Hiro had "suggested" the specific high-torque motor model.

A rhythmic, heavy pounding started on his front door. Not a knock—a demand.

"Yuto! Open up! I know you're in there brooding. I can smell the angst through the wood!"

Yuto sighed, rolling over to the intercom. "Go away, Hiro. I'm filing paperwork."

"Liar. You're watching historical documentaries and eating bland crackers. Open the door or I'm kicking it in. I've got a warrant for 'excessive grumpiness.'"

Yuto buzzed him in. Hiro burst through the door, still in his sharp charcoal suit, carrying a bag of takeout and looking entirely too energized. He didn't ask; he just started clearing Yuto's desk.

"You look like hell," Hiro noted, tossing a container of spicy noodles in front of Yuto. "Eat. Then get dressed. We have a call."

"A call? From which district?"

"Both," Hiro grinned. "And you're going to love this one. It's a disaster."

The Cold Case

The crime scene was "The Polka-Dot Parlor," a neon-pink and mint-green ice cream shop sitting exactly on the district line.

Yuto and Hiro climbed out of the SUV, two formidable men in tailored suits, looking like they were ready to take down a cartel. Instead, they were greeted by giant fiberglass sprinkles and the smell of artificial strawberry. The victim, a disgruntled shift lead, was face-down in a vat of 'Blueberry Blast.'

"Truly a chilling crime," Hiro deadpanned, stepping over a puddle of melted chocolate.

"If you make one more 'cold' pun, I'm reporting you for professional misconduct," Yuto snapped, though his eyes were already scanning the room.

They looked absurd—two stern, dangerous-looking detectives surrounded by pastel colors and balloon animals.

"Table four," Yuto pointed out, his analytical mind clicking back into gear. "Four half-eaten sundaes. Four suspects still in the back room."

"Let's go talk to them," Hiro said, grabbing a spoon from the counter and sampling a stray tub of vanilla. "Hey, this is actually pretty good."

"Hiro! That's evidence! Or at least, it's unsanitary!"

"I'm testing the motive, Yuto. If the ice cream is this good, people would kill for it."

The Interrogation

They lined up the suspects: the nervous teenager in the mascot suit, the rival shop owner from across the street, the victim's ex-girlfriend, and the delivery driver.

"Alright, listen up," Hiro growled, leaning over the counter to tower over the teenager. "One of you turned this sprinkles-fest into a morgue. Who was it?"

The teenager started crying. Yuto rolled his eyes. "Hiro, stop traumatizing the kid. He didn't do it. Look at his hands—he's got a nut allergy, and the victim was covered in almond shavings. He wouldn't have touched the body."

Yuto turned his attention to the delivery driver. "You, however... your log says you arrived at 4:00 PM, but the ice cream in your truck is completely melted. You weren't delivering. You were waiting. Waiting for the shop to empty so you could confront him about the gambling debts, right?"

The driver bolted for the door. Hiro didn't even blink; he just stuck out a leg, tripping the man effortlessly. The driver hit the floor with a wet thud, right into a pile of waffle cones.

"Nice catch," Yuto murmured.

"I aim to please," Hiro smirked, cuffing the man.

The Sunset

The paperwork took hours, but by the time the forensics team cleared out, the sun was beginning to dip below the horizon, painting the sky in streaks of vivid pink and deep orange—matching the ridiculous decor of the shop.

"We missed dinner," Hiro grumbled, sitting on the bench outside the shop. He had two large cones in his hands. He handed a Mint Chip to Yuto. "Here. Peace offering for tripping that guy into the cones. I know you like the organized ones."

Yuto took the ice cream, looking at the sunset. The tension of the last few days—the memory of Kageyama, the feeling of the cold floor—seemed to soften under the warm light.

"It's a date, then?" Yuto asked, his voice teasing but with a tremor of something real beneath it.

Hiro froze, a bit of strawberry ice cream on his lip. He laughed, but his cheeks were a shade redder than the sunset. "In your dreams, Princess. It’s a 'professional debriefing' over dairy."

They sat in silence for a long time, the only sound the distant traffic and the melting of their cones. Gradually, Hiro’s head began to tilt. The adrenaline of the case and the long nights finally caught up to him. His shoulder brushed against Yuto’s, and then, with a soft sigh, his head settled firmly onto Yuto’s lap.

Yuto went still. His heart hammered against his ribs—a sensation far more intense than any high-speed chase. He looked down at Hiro’s sleeping face. Without the cocky grin and the sharp remarks, Hiro looked... peaceful. Vulnerable.

Yuto hesitated, then slowly reached out. He rested his hand in Hiro’s dark hair, his fingers lingering there as the pink light faded into the deep blue of twilight.

He didn't move. He didn't want the sun to come back up. He just watched his rival breathe, wondering when the border between them had become so impossible to find.

Chapter 3: The Swap

The New Partner

Yuto was adjusting his desk in District 9 when the Captain walked in, looking exhausted. Behind him, leaning against the doorframe with a duffel bag and a smirk that didn't quite reach his eyes, was Hiro.

"Effective immediately," the Captain sighed, "Detective Hiro has been reassigned from District 10. He's your new permanent partner, Yuto. Try not to kill each other."

Yuto's pen snapped in his hand. "Reassigned? He's the golden boy of the Tenth. Why would he take a demotion to the Ninth?"

"Maybe I missed your charming personality," Hiro quipped, though he avoided Yuto's gaze as he began dumping his gear onto the empty desk adjacent to Yuto's.

"Hiro," Yuto said, his voice low and dangerous. "What are you doing here?"

"Solving crimes, Princess. Speaking of which..." Hiro tossed a folder onto Yuto's lap. "Domestic. Wife found dead in her garden. Let's move."

The Size 8 Secret

The scene was a suburban nightmare. A woman, Sarah Miller, lay dead near her rosebushes. The husband was hysterical, claiming an intruder had attacked them. The case felt open-and-shut; the husband's story was shaky, his hand was bruised, and the motive was clear—life insurance.

But as they processed the porch, Yuto paused. He looked at a pair of muddy sneakers sitting by the door. Then he looked at the victim's feet.

"Hiro," Yuto called out.

"Yeah? I'm busy finding the murder weapon."

"Yesterday, we saw Sarah Miller at the grocery store during that preliminary canvass. She was wearing size 9 heels. I remember because she tripped, and I saw the label." Yuto pointed to the sneakers on the porch. "These are size 8. And the woman on the grass? She's wearing size 8 too."

They dug deeper. Within an hour, the truth unraveled like a frayed sweater. Sarah had an identical twin, Elena. Elena had discovered the husband's plan to kill Sarah and had swapped places with her sister that morning, sending Sarah away to "spa day" to keep her safe.

Elena had died in her sister's place.

As the detectives were wrapping up, a car screeched into the driveway. Sarah Miller hopped out, laughing about her day, only to see her own face staring back at her from under a white sheet. The scream she let out was a sound that would haunt the quiet suburb for years.

The Academy Ghost

By the time they returned to the station, the sun was setting, casting a long, orange glow through the windows. The office was empty. Hiro grabbed his jacket, heading for the door.

"Hiro," Yuto called out. He didn't use a nickname. He didn't bicker.

Hiro stopped, his back to Yuto. "It's late, Yuto. Save the lecture for tomorrow."

"Why did you move to my district?" Yuto demanded. "You're the top-rated detective in the city. You don't just leave a lead position to be a partner in a slum precinct. Why now?"

Hiro tried to chuckle, his usual armor. "I told you, the coffee is better here—"

"Stop it!" Yuto slammed his hand on his desk. "Be serious for once. You've been hovering around me ever since Kageyama showed up. Why?"

Hiro turned slowly. The mask was gone. His face looked older, tired. "Because that warehouse fire three years ago... the one that took your legs... that was my case, Yuto. I was the one assigned to Kageyama. You only went in there because I was running late. You took my shift."

Yuto went cold. He remembered the Academy—how they had graduated top of their class together. They were inseparable back then. Best friends who promised to change the city. But after the accident, Hiro had vanished, transforming from a meticulous strategist into a reckless "instincts-first" detective.

"I can't be the reason you kill yourself one more time," Hiro said, his voice thick with a decade of repressed guilt. "I watched you break once because of me. I won't watch it happen again. I'm staying until I know Kageyama is in the ground or I am."

Hiro turned to leave, his hand on the door handle.

"Hiro," Yuto called after him. Hiro paused. "I don't have a twin. I don't have a sister to send away in my place." Yuto looked at his useless legs, then back at the orange sky. "I can't die twice in this lifetime. So don't think you're saving me by being here."

Hiro didn't respond. He simply walked out, the heavy door clicking shut behind him.

Left alone in the orange twilight, Yuto felt the prick of tears. He looked at his hands, then at Hiro’s empty chair. "You idiot," he whispered to the empty room, his voice trembling. "You were always the one I was trying to save."

Chapter 4: The Sacred and the Profane

The Ritual of Water

The steam in the temple bathhouse was thick enough to swallow them whole. To the Head Priest, this was a cleansing ritual; to Yuto and Hiro, it was a trap of forced intimacy.

"I've got you," Hiro whispered, his voice echoing off the cedar walls. He lifted Yuto from the chair, his arms hooked securely under Yuto's knees and back. As Hiro lowered him onto the smooth, heated stone bench, the friction of their skin against each other sent a jolt through the quiet room.

Yuto sat exposed, his useless legs resting against the stone. He watched Hiro shed his own clothes, the other man's physique a map of scars and lean muscle. When Hiro knelt between Yuto's knees to begin the washing, the proximity was suffocating.

The Rising Tension

Yuto's body was a contradiction. While his legs were silent, his "manhood" remained stubbornly, sharply alive—a biological reflex that often flared up during high-stress situations or moments of extreme adrenaline. Here, surrounded by the scent of cedar and the heat of Hiro's breath, it stirred with a sudden, undeniable ferocity.

Hiro froze, his hand holding the sponge mid-air as his gaze fell to Yuto's lap. He saw the way Yuto had grown, standing tall and unaffected by the tragedy of his spine.

"Yuto..." Hiro's voice was a low growl.

The sight triggered something primal in Hiro. Under the gaze of his rival, Hiro's own desire mirrored Yuto's, straining against the air. The bickering, the guilt, and the years of "what ifs" condensed into the small space between them.

The Exchange

Without a word, Hiro reached out. His palm was calloused and warm as it cupped Yuto, his thumb tracing the length with an agonizingly slow rhythm. Yuto gasped, his head falling back against the cedar wall, his fingers digging into Hiro's damp shoulders.

"Don't stop," Yuto hissed, his pride discarded in the steam.

He reached down, his own hand finding Hiro. They began an rhythmic, feverish exchange—a mutual handjob that felt less like a romantic gesture and more like a desperate, physical exorcism. The friction of their palms, slick with the sacred spring water, created a frantic heat.

They watched each other, eyes locked in a silent challenge even now. Hiro's breath came in ragged hitches as he increased the pace, his grip firm and sure. Yuto felt the world narrowing down to the point of contact, a building pressure that made his vision blur.

The climax was a sudden, white-hot explosion for both. They "nutted" in near-simultaneity, the release leaving them trembling and spent in the cooling water. The liquid evidence of their encounter mingled with the steam and the mountain spring, swirling down the drain.

The Aftermath

The silence that followed was deafening. The post-nut clarity hit Yuto like a physical blow. He looked at Hiro, who was already pulling away, his face unreadable as he reached for a bucket to rinse himself off.

"The poison," Yuto croaked, his voice raw. He forced his mind back to the case, using the logic as a life raft to escape the drowning intimacy of the moment. "It's on the floor. That's why we had to wash."

They dressed in a hurry, their movements jerky and avoiding contact. The Head Priest was waiting outside, but the "purity" he preached felt like a lie compared to the raw, messy truth of what had just happened between the two detectives.

The Pact

The drive back was silent. Hiro gripped the steering wheel at ten and two, his eyes fixed on the road. When they reached Yuto's building, the air in the SUV was thick with the ghost of the temple's heat.

"Yuto," Hiro said, his voice hard. "About the bath."

"I know," Yuto interrupted, his hand on the door handle. "We never speak of it. It didn't happen. It was a chemical reaction to the stress. Nothing more."

"Right," Hiro nodded, his jaw tight. "Just a case. See you tomorrow."

As Yuto rolled into his dark apartment, the smell of cedar still clung to his skin, a reminder that some borders, once crossed, can never be unmapped.

Chapter 5: The Third Floor

The Resignation

The 0800 briefing started not with a case, but with a shockwave. Yuto sat in his chair, his eyes fixed on the empty desk beside him. When the Superintendent walked in, he didn't look at the files; he looked at Yuto.

"Detective Hiro has resigned," the Superintendent announced, his voice devoid of emotion. "He had a... fundamental disagreement with the board regarding the Kageyama oversight. Effective tomorrow morning, he is no longer with the force. He's starting his own private practice."

Yuto's world tilted. The "pact" from the temple felt like it was crumbling. He waited until the office cleared to call Hiro, but the phone just rang. Hiro was gone before the shift even began.

One Last Case

The universe, however, had a cruel sense of timing. Before Hiro could even hand in his badge, a priority call came in: a murder on a city bus. The victim was a seventeen-year-old boy, stabbed in broad daylight while the bus was in motion. Because the bus had crossed the meridian line during the struggle, the board ordered the "duo" to handle it one last time.

They met at the transit depot. Hiro wasn't in his suit; he was in a leather jacket and jeans, looking like the rebel he had always been at heart.

"Last one, Princess," Hiro said, his voice unusually quiet.

The investigation was swift. They had four suspects—all teenagers who had been on the bus. But as Yuto analyzed the seating chart and the angle of the blade, the truth emerged from a backpack full of college brochures. The killer was the victim's best friend.

The friend hadn't acted out of hate, but a terrifying, possessive love. The victim was leaving for an out-of-state college, and the friend couldn't handle the "betrayal." If I can't have you as my best friend, no one can, the boy had confessed through tears.

As the boy was led away, Hiro leaned against the bus tire. "People are obsessed with borders, Yuto. Who belongs to who. Where one life ends and another begins. It's exhausting."

The Parting

They didn't go back to the station to clock out. They stood in the precinct parking lot, the neon lights of the city flickering to life.

"I've got an office in the old textile district," Hiro said, mounting his bike. He looked at Yuto, his expression unreadable. "You're welcome to be in my practice. If you ever get tired of the red tape."

Yuto scoffed, looking at the precinct doors. "I'm a detective, Hiro. Not a 'private eye' in a noir novel."

As Hiro kicked the kickstand, a man in the shadows near the garage—a disgraced officer Hiro had once testified against—spat on the ground. "You'll regret starting your own, Hiro. Out there, you've got no shield to hide behind."

Hiro didn't even look back. He just roared off into the night.

The Clank

Later that night, Hiro was in his new office—a dusty, third-floor walk-up with high ceilings and a view of the docks. He was setting up his desk, the silence of the building feeling strange after years of the bustling station.

Clank.

Hiro froze. It was a heavy, metallic sound.

Clank. Scrape. Clank.

He recalled the man in the shadows. Revenge was a common theme in their line of work. He drew his personal sidearm, his heart hammering against his ribs. The sound was coming from the hallway—a slow, rhythmic dragging, like something heavy being hauled up the stairs.

The sound grew louder, nearer, until it reached his door. There was a faint, exhausted thud against the wood.

Hiro opened the door cautiously, weapon lowered but ready. He gasped.

Yuto was on the floor. He had left his wheelchair at the bottom of the three-flight staircase. His face was flushed, sweat dripping from his chin, his expensive suit jacket discarded somewhere on the second floor. His hands were raw, covered in the dust of the stairs he had just climbed using nothing but the strength of his arms.

Yuto looked up, his breathing ragged, and held up a bruised hand toward Hiro.

"Partners?" Yuto rasped.

Hiro stared for a long beat, his own eyes watering. He reached down, his large hand clasing Yuto's with enough force to bruise. He hauled Yuto inside, pulling him into the center of the room.

"Partners," Hiro whispered.

Yuto leaned back against the office wall, wiping his forehead. He looked around the empty, dusty space and managed a weak, sarcastic smirk. "You should really invest in some accessible ramps, Hiro. I had to drag myself up the stairs and leave the chair outside like a bicycle. If I'm joining this practice, the first thing on the expense report is an elevator."

Hiro laughed, the sound echoing through the empty office, and for the first time in three years, the meridian line between them felt like it had finally vanished.

Chapter 6: The HR Office

The First Morning

The sun crawled through the dusty windows of the third-floor office, illuminating the stacks of boxes and the singular, brand-new desk Hiro had managed to assemble.

Yuto was already there, sharp in a charcoal three-piece suit, his tie knotted with mathematical precision. He was sitting in his new wheelchair—delivered by a courier an hour earlier—sorting through a pile of "pro bono" requests.

Hiro, by contrast, looked like he had just rolled out of a dive bar. He wore a faded, oversized t-shirt and loose cotton boxers, his hair a chaotic mess of dark strands.

"Dress code, Hiro," Yuto remarked without looking up. "We are professionals. Not roommates in a dorm."

Hiro leaned against the doorframe, a mug of steaming coffee in his hand. He looked Yuto up and down, his gaze lingering on the tight fit of the vest over Yuto's chest. "There are no official rules here, Princess. And honestly? Seeing you get all worked up in that stiff suit? It turns me on."

Yuto’s pen stopped. A slow, hot flush crept up his neck, reaching the tips of his ears. "Have you forgotten the Temple? We made a pact. That was a moment of... situational stress."

"We are our own HR office now, Yuto," Hiro countered, stepping closer. "No board. No Captain. Just us. And if the boss wants to appreciate the scenery, who’s going to stop him?"

The Crossing

Hiro stared at Yuto for a long time, the silence stretching until it was vibrating with the memory of the steam and the mountain water. When Yuto didn't respond, Hiro gave a half-shrug and turned toward the kitchenette.

A hand caught his arm.

Yuto’s grip was firm, pulling Hiro back. "You know... you’re right," Yuto murmured, his voice dropping into a register that made Hiro’s pulse spike. He looked Hiro in the eye, a predatory glint replacing the cold detective. "But you should really invest in pants. Because if you don't, I could always do this."

Yuto leaned forward, his hands sliding under the loose fabric of Hiro’s boxers. Hiro let out a sharp, ragged breath as Yuto’s fingers found the leg holes, his touch searing against Hiro’s thighs. Without hesitation, Yuto pressed his face against the front of Hiro’s boxers, his lips finding the heat of Hiro’s manhood through the thin cotton.

Hiro’s head hit the wall behind him with a soft thud. "Yuto..."

The Exchange

The office floor became their sanctuary. Hiro worked with a frantic, desperate energy, helping Yuto out of the charcoal jacket and the silk vest until Yuto was left in only his crisp white shirt, his tie hanging loose, and his dark boxers.

Hiro knelt between Yuto’s immobile legs, his tongue tracing the line of Yuto’s pelvis, dipping into the hollows of his hips. He moved lower, his mouth finding the sensitive skin just beneath Yuto’s penis, teasing and pleasuring him with a focused, wet intensity.

Despite the lack of sensation in his lower half, the psychological rush of Hiro’s devotion sent waves of heat through Yuto’s upper body. He arched his back, his fingers tangling in Hiro’s hair, pulling him closer.

The air in the dusty office grew thick as Hiro lifted Yuto with practiced ease, placing him on the edge of the new mahogany desk. He moved Yuto’s legs aside, settling himself between them. "I've been thinking about this since the Academy," Hiro whispered, his voice thick.

He pulled Yuto’s boxers down, revealing the sharp, insistent length of Yuto's arousal. Hiro didn't hesitate; he took Yuto into his mouth, his tongue swirling around the tip before sliding down the shaft. He used his hands to massage the muscles of Yuto’s inner thighs, creating a phantom heat that Yuto swore he could feel deep in his bones.

Yuto gripped the edge of the desk so hard his knuckles turned white. "Hiro... damn you..."

"You like that, Princess?" Hiro murmured against his skin, before turning Yuto around. Even without the use of his legs, Yuto was strong; he propped himself up on his elbows on the desk, his back arched, presenting himself to Hiro.

Hiro's breath hit the small of Yuto's back. He prepared Yuto with a slick, slow patience, his fingers tracing patterns that made Yuto’s breath hitch. When Hiro finally pushed forward, entering him with a slow, agonizing slide, the office seemed to vanish. Hiro leaned over him, his chest pressing against Yuto’s back, his hands reaching forward to grip Yuto’s own, pinning them to the desk.

"It’s in," Hiro gasped, his rhythm steady and demanding.

"Are you dumb?" Yuto panted, his eyes blown wide. "I can't feel anything under my waist, Hiro. You know that."

Hiro let out a low, dark chuckle, his mouth ghosting over Yuto's ear. "Oh, you'll be surprised by the tricks I've learned. I'm hitting the spots that make your brain light up, not just your nerves."

Hiro shifted the angle, driving deeper, his movements rhythmic and raw. He reached around to stroke Yuto's front, syncing their climaxes. The friction, the heat, and the sheer weight of Hiro's body over him sent Yuto into a spiraling frenzy. The psychological intensity of being completely claimed by the man who had haunted his dreams for years was enough to break through the silence of his spine.

They were a tangle of limbs and gasps, the sounds of their skin slapping and the desk creaking echoing through the empty building. Hiro's teeth grazed Yuto's shoulder as the final wave hit them both, a violent, messy release that left them slumped against the mahogany, hearts beating as one.

The Interruption

They were on the verge of a second, even more explosive round when a violent, impatient knock thundered against the office door.

BAM. BAM. BAM.

They froze, tangled together on the desk, chests heaving.

"Hiro, get it," Yuto whispered, his voice a panicked rasp.

"It can wait," Hiro groaned, his face buried in Yuto's neck.

The knocks grew louder, accompanied by the muffled sound of a woman sobbing on the other side of the wood. "Please! Is anyone there? Detective Hiro? Please help me!"

"Shit," they whispered in unison.

The frantic scramble began. Hiro, realizing he was the only one who could stand quickly, grabbed the first pair of trousers he could find—Yuto's expensive charcoal suit pants. He stepped into them, the hem trailing slightly on the floor as he zipped them up over his bare waist.

Yuto, meanwhile, was forced to wheel himself backward into the tiny, unfinished bathroom, still in his white shirt and boxers, clutching his suit jacket to his chest like a shield.

"You stole my pants!" Yuto's phone buzzed almost immediately in Hiro's pocket.

Hiro ignored the text, smoothing his hair and opening the door to find a distraught woman in a tattered coat. He put on his best "professional" face, even as he felt the cool air against his bare chest and realized he was still missing a shirt.

In the bathroom, Yuto sat in the dark, furiously typing. HIRO, I AM LITERALLY SITTING HERE IN MY UNDERWEAR. IF YOU DON'T BRING ME MY PANTS IN FIVE MINUTES, THE FIRST PRIVATE CASE WE HANDLE WILL BE YOUR MURDER.

Hiro just leaned against the doorframe, looking at the woman and then back at the bathroom door, a smirk playing on his lips. The practice was officially open.

Chapter 7: The Blood of the Flower

The Wardrobe Malfunction

The distraught woman, Mrs. Arisaka, sat on the edge of the only chair in the office, sobbing into a handkerchief. Hiro stood before her, trying to look authoritative despite being shirtless and wearing Yuto's expensive, oversized charcoal trousers.

"Please, Detective," she wailed. "My husband... he didn't come home. He was working at the botanical gardens, developing a rare hybrid. I think he's been kidnapped!"

Inside the tiny bathroom, Yuto was fuming. He had no choice but to rummage through the boxes Hiro had brought from his old apartment. He emerged minutes later, rolling into the room with a look of pure murder.

Yuto was wearing Hiro's faded, baggy "District 10 Athletics" hoodie and a pair of old, grey sweatpants that were three sizes too big. The sleeves swallowed his hands, and the hood was lopsided. He looked less like a elite detective and more like a hungover college student.

Hiro bit his lip to keep from laughing. Yuto's glare could have melted lead.

"Mrs. Arisaka," Yuto said, his voice regaining its professional chill despite the hoodie. "Tell us about the hybrid."

The Botanical Puzzle

The husband, Dr. Arisaka, was a botanist specializing in 'The Lunar Lily'—a flower that only bloomed once every decade. The case seemed like corporate espionage until they visited the greenhouse.

"Look at the soil," Yuto noted, leaning out of his chair to inspect the base of the central planter. "It's too dark. Too rich."

Hiro leaned over him, his chest brushing against Yuto's shoulder. The scent of their earlier encounter—sweat and cedar—was still lingering on their skin, making it hard to focus. Hiro's hand rested on the back of Yuto's chair, his thumb subconsciously stroking the metal.

"It's blood," Hiro whispered, his instincts kicking in. "Someone didn't kidnap him. They buried him."

They found the body beneath the roots of the Lunar Lily. But the killer wasn't a corporate rival. It was the greenhouse's night watchman, who had been obsessed with the flower's legend. He believed the lily required a 'human heart' to bloom.

The Evidence in the Dark

Back at the office that evening, the adrenaline of the arrest was fading, replaced by the simmering heat that had been interrupted earlier.

"We got the confession," Hiro said, closing the door and locking it. He turned to Yuto, who was still in the oversized hoodie. "And I think I owe you those pants back."

Hiro walked over, his eyes dark with intent. He reached down, his hands sliding under the baggy hoodie to find Yuto's waist. He leaned in, his lips inches from Yuto's, his breath hot against Yuto's skin. The memory of the desk, the friction, and the release was clawing at both of them.

Hiro leaned in for a deep, soul-searing kiss, but Yuto suddenly slammed his hands against Hiro's chest, pushing him back with surprising force.

"Wait!" Yuto gasped.

"What? Did I break another pact?" Hiro grumbled, frustrated.

"No, you idiot! Look!" Yuto pointed behind Hiro's back to the evidence board. "The watchman's log. The entries for the last three nights were forged by a second hand. There was an accomplice. The brother-in-law was in on it for the insurance money!"

"Are you serious right now?" Hiro groaned, looking at the scribbled notes. "We're in the middle of... and you're solving the sub-plot?"

"I'm a professional, Hiro! Now, get the laptop. We need to alert the D.A. before he flees."

The Escapade

They spent the next hour finishing the paperwork, the sexual tension thick enough to ignite the oxygen in the room. Every time their hands brushed over the keyboard, Hiro would growl under his breath.

Finally, the email was sent. The case was truly closed.

"Okay," Hiro said, standing up and sweeping the laptop off the desk. "Now?"

Yuto looked at the dusty office, the hard mahogany desk, and the lack of a proper bed. He looked at Hiro, who was still half-naked and looking devastatingly handsome in the moonlight.

"Not here," Yuto whispered, a smirk finally breaking through his stoic mask. "My apartment. It has a lift. And a reinforced bedframe."

Hiro didn't need to be told twice. He scooped Yuto up, chair and all, and headed for the stairs. The night was young, the district lines were gone, and they had a lot of lost time to make up for.

Chapter 8: Alpine Silence

The Lodge

The Alps were a jagged, white horizon of silence—the perfect place to forget the grime of the city. Hiro had booked a secluded cabin lodge, a masterwork of dark spruce and stone. For the first time in years, there were no sirens, no precinct radios, and no district lines.

Inside, the fireplace crackled, casting dancing shadows against the timber walls. Hiro had lifted Yuto onto the thick, fur-lined rug before the hearth. The heat of the fire was nothing compared to the friction of their bodies.

They moved with a desperate, heavy rhythm, the scent of pine needles and expensive cologne mingling in the air. As Hiro drove into him, his hands pinning Yuto's wrists to the fur, Yuto felt a wave of emotion so intense it threatened to bypass his logic entirely. He looked up at Hiro's face—flushed, sweating, eyes shut in a mask of pure focus.

"Hiro," Yuto gasped, his voice breaking. "I... I think I—"

But before the words "love you" could escape, Hiro's hand snapped up, his palm pressing firmly over Yuto's mouth. Hiro's eyes flew open, burning with a dark, primal intensity. He shook his head slowly, his breath hitching as he reached his own peak. He didn't want the words to break the spell; he wanted the feeling to be enough.

The Scream

They settled in the kitchen an hour later, the cabin glowing with a warm, domestic peace. Hiro was searing steaks while Yuto sat in his chair, turning a silver fork over in his hands. The silence was comfortable, but the words were still burning in Yuto's throat.

"Hiro, about earlier," Yuto began, looking at the flickering candlelight. "I've been thinking about the Academy, and the years we wasted, and I realized that I—"

AIEEEE!

A piercing, jagged scream ripped through the mountain air, coming from the lodge directly adjacent to theirs. Both men were moving before the sound even faded. Hiro grabbed his sidearm from the counter, and Yuto spun his chair toward the door, the "vacation" officially dead.

The Victim of Her Own Web

They burst into the neighboring cabin to find a grisly scene. A young woman, Elena, lay slumped over a vanity, her throat constricted by a sophisticated wire trap triggered by the opening of a jewelry box.

Three family members stood in the room, frozen in shock: the sister, who looked hollow; the mother, clutching a ledger; and the stepfather, his knuckles white.

"Everyone stay exactly where you are," Hiro barked, his detective persona snapping back like a coiled spring.

The motives were a tangled web. The victim had stolen her sister's architectural designs to win international awards. She had been systematically embezzling from her mother's retirement fund. Most damningly, she had sent her stepfather to prison for a year on a false assault charge, only to laugh about the lie upon his release.

"It was the wire," Yuto noted, his eyes scanning the mechanics of the trap. "It's a professional tension knot. Only someone with architectural training could tie this."

He looked at the sister, whose hands were shaking. But then, the sister spoke a single, quiet sentence: "She always had to have the last word, even when the design wasn't hers."

Yuto's eyes widened. He looked at the jewelry box. It wasn't meant for the victim. "The target wasn't Elena," Yuto whispered. "The target was the sister."

The revelation was chilling. Elena had been trying to set a trap for her sister—a final act of spite to "punish" the person whose talent she had stolen. But in her haste and arrogance, Elena had tripped over her own wire while setting the box on her own vanity. She hadn't been murdered; she had accidentally executed herself with her own malice.

The Fireplace

The police eventually took over, leaving Yuto and Hiro to walk back to their cabin through the knee-deep snow. The cold air cleared the smell of death, but the weight of the case remained.

Back inside, the fire had burned down to embers. Yuto looked at Hiro, the "I love you" still sitting on the tip of his tongue. He realized that life was fragile—wires could snap, beams could fall, and words could be lost.

He decided to show it instead.

"The floor," Yuto said, his voice a low command. "By the fireplace."

He didn't say the words. Instead, he reached out and pulled Hiro down into the scent of sprucewood and the dying heat of the hearth. As they moved together on the rug, the silence between them wasn't empty anymore. It was full of everything Yuto hadn't said, written in the language of skin and shadow.

Chapter 9: The Heavy Weight of Truth

The Broken Throne

The morning started with a sickening crack. As Yuto tried to pivot from his SUV to his wheelchair, a rusted titanium strut finally gave way, fatigued from the third-floor stairs. Yuto plummeted toward the asphalt, but Hiro was there, catching him in a crushing embrace.

"I've got you," Hiro whispered, his heart hammering against Yuto's chest.

"The Fleur case," Yuto gasped, his face burning with the shame of his sudden, total dependence. "We can't cancel. The crime scene is fresh."

"Then I'm your ride," Hiro said, his voice firm. He lifted Yuto into the passenger seat, the broken chair left behind like a discarded shell.

The Showroom Floor

The Fleur Furnishing House was a labyrinth of velvet, mahogany, and shadows. The secretary, Mina, lay dead on a $12,000 'Emperor's Lounge.' There were no signs of a struggle—only a microscopic puncture in her neck.

Hiro carried Yuto through the showroom, his boots echoing on the polished wood. To the staff, they looked like a terrifying, singular entity—a beast with two heads and four eyes. Hiro would deposit Yuto onto various display chairs, letting him analyze the angles while Hiro interviewed the suspects: the cold-eyed wife, the trembling boss, and the silent chauffeur.

Every time Hiro moved away to check a perimeter, Yuto felt the suffocating weight of his helplessness. He sat on a high-backed wing chair, his useless legs dangling, when he heard a faint creak behind a nearby armoire.

"Hiro?" Yuto called out. No answer.

Suddenly, a heavy floor lamp tilted, seemingly on its own, crashing inches from Yuto's head. He lunged forward, his upper body strength allowing him to roll onto the floor, dragging himself away from the shattered glass. He felt the phantom presence of someone watching, a hunter waiting for the bird to fall from the nest.

The Physical Toll

By the third hour, the stress and the lack of a proper bathroom break began to take a toll. Yuto had been sitting in a cream-colored 'Victorian Settee' for too long. He tried to signal Hiro, but Hiro was deep in an argument with the chauffeur across the room.

The internal signals Yuto usually managed with a schedule were Haywire. Before he could call out, he felt the warmth. The humiliation was absolute. A dark, spreading stain of urine bloomed across the light fabric of the $8,000 sofa.

"Hiro..." Yuto’s voice was a broken whisper.

Hiro rushed over, seeing the panic in Yuto's eyes. He didn't make a joke. He didn't mock him. He simply scooped Yuto up, shielding the back of Yuto's trousers with his jacket.

"Look," Yuto said, pointing with a trembling finger at the settee.

The moisture had reacted with a hidden chemical treatment in the fabric. As the liquid soaked in, a series of faint, purple lines appeared—a schematic mapped out by the killer. The stain had acted as a developer for a hidden ink.

"It’s a firing line," Yuto realized, his detective brain overriding his shame. "The chairs are mapped. If you sit in this one, the pressure triggers a needle-gun in the ottoman opposite."

The Capture

"The daughter," Yuto said, leaning his head against Hiro's shoulder as Hiro carried him toward the back office. "The wife knew about the affair, but the daughter was the one who studied mechanical engineering. She treated this showroom like a giant, lethal dollhouse."

Suddenly, the lights cut out. A small, shadow-like figure bolted from under a dining table, swinging a heavy brass bookend. Hiro stepped into the blow, protecting Yuto’s head, and tackled the girl into a pile of decorative pillows.

"Got you, you little sociopath," Hiro growled, pinning her wrists.

The daughter screamed, revealing that she had killed the secretary because "she was a stain on my mother’s house." The father had tried to cover the 'glitches' in the furniture, horrified by his daughter's genius.

The Reward

On the way home, Yuto sat wrapped in Hiro’s spare jacket, his eyes fixed on the window. "I ruined an $8,000 sofa, Hiro. And I... I couldn't even stand up to catch her."

"You solved the case using your own 'evidence,' Princess," Hiro said, his voice unusually tender. "And you didn't ruin the sofa. You turned it into a map. That's the most brilliant thing I've ever seen."

When they reached the office, Hiro didn't put Yuto on the floor. He carried him to the back corner, where a new, sturdy king-sized bed with a reinforced frame was waiting.

"Bought it this morning while you were sleeping," Hiro said, laying Yuto down on the fresh linens. He leaned over, his gaze heavy with a heat that made Yuto's breath hitch. "I figure if we're going to work late, you should have a proper place to be handled."

Hiro leaned in, his mouth ghosting over Yuto's, but Yuto pushed him back one last time, a smirk finally returning to his face. "The evidence, Hiro. The purple ink on your jacket... it's still wet. If we do this now, you'll be a walking crime scene."

Hiro laughed, stripping off the jacket and tossing it across the room. "Then let's make a new one."

He winked, his hands finding the hem of Yuto's shirt, and the private practice officially celebrated its most messy, brilliant victory yet.

Chapter 10: The Phantom Ledger

The Pregnant Stranger

The morning air in the third-floor office felt thin. Hiro was out of state, chasing a lead on a cold case in the north, leaving Yuto alone with his morning coffee and a stack of financial audits. For the first time since the practice opened, the silence wasn't comforting—it was a vacuum.

The door burst open without a knock.

A woman, disheveled and visibly pregnant, stormed in. She wasn't just crying; she was vibrating with a desperate, righteous fury. "Where is he? Where is Hiro?"

Yuto's coffee mug hit the floor, shattering into ceramic shards. He wheeled himself closer, his heart hammering. "Madam, calm down. Detective Hiro is out of town. What is this about?"

"He sent me this!" she shrieked, thrusting a crumpled letter into Yuto's hand. It was a cold, clinical notice—allegedly from Hiro—stating that all financial support for her and the unborn child was being terminated immediately.

Yuto scanned the letter. The handwriting was a hauntingly accurate imitation of Hiro's jagged script. His protective instincts flared. Even if the claim was a shock, he couldn't leave a pregnant woman in this state. "I will handle this. Let me escort you home, and we will get to the bottom of this."

The woman nodded weakly. Yuto didn't see the flicker of a cold, predatory smile as he turned to grab his coat.

The Hunt

By late afternoon, Hiro roared back into the city on his bike. He took the stairs two at a time, expecting to find Yuto. Instead, he found a tomb.

The office was empty. The shattered mug sat in a pool of dried coffee. Hiro's pupils dilated instinctively, his detective mind clicking into a high-functioning panic. He began tearing the room apart, looking for any scrap of evidence. He checked the desk, the trash, the files. Nothing.

It wasn't until 8:00 PM, as the moon cast long, skeletal shadows across the floor, that he saw it. A corner of white paper was tucked deep under the velvet sofa they had bought from the furnishing house.

He pulled it out. It was a second letter—the one the woman had shown Yuto—seemingly dropped or hidden during the confrontation. Hiro recognized the address scribbled on the back: a derelict townhouse in the old industrial zone. He didn't need to read the words to know who was behind it.

"Kageyama," Hiro growled, the name a curse on his lips.

The Fire and the Floor

The industrial zone house was an architectural skeleton, its windows boarded up like blinded eyes. Hiro didn't wait for backup. He kicked the front door off its hinges just as the smell of gasoline hit his nose.

The interior was a furnace. Orange light flickered against the peeling wallpaper. In the center of the basement, Hiro found him.

Yuto was stripped bare, his pale skin reflecting the encroaching flames. He was sprawled on the cold concrete, his wheelchair nowhere to be found. He had been beaten, his upper body covered in bruises where he had tried to fight back against the "pregnant" woman's accomplices. Kageyama had wanted to strip him of everything—his clothes, his dignity, his mobility—before the fire took the rest.

"Yuto!" Hiro screamed, leaping over a fallen, burning beam.

Yuto’s eyes fluttered open. He was weak, his breath coming in shallow hitches. He looked up at Hiro, a ghost of a smile touching his bruised lips. "You're... late... again."

"Not this time," Hiro choked out. He scooped Yuto up, ignoring the way the heat singed his own jacket. He held Yuto against his chest, shield-like, as he charged back through the collapsing hallway. The roof groaned, a shower of sparks raining down on them, but Hiro didn't stop until he hit the cold, night air of the street.

The Waking

The hospital room was sterile and quiet. Yuto lay in the bed, his chest swathed in bandages. Hiro sat in the chair beside him, his hands buried in his hair, his knuckles raw.

Yuto’s hand twitched on the white sheet. His eyes opened slowly. He saw Hiro—burnt, tired, and looking like he hadn't slept in a century.

"The woman," Yuto rasped, his voice barely a whisper. "She wasn't... pregnant, was she?"

Hiro leaned forward, gripping Yuto’s hand with a strength that was almost painful. "It was a prosthetic, Yuto. A prop. The letter was a front. He knew I was away, and he knew you wouldn't turn your back on a woman in need."

Hiro leaned in, pressing his forehead against Yuto's. "But you're never going to have to crawl again. I'm the floor, the walls, and the roof. You hear me?"

Yuto closed his eyes, a single tear escaping. "Then you better... invest in a better security system for the office. And some... real coffee."

Hiro laughed, a broken, relieved sound, as he held his partner in the quiet safety of the ward.

Chapter 11: The Second Dose

The Ghostly Coat

The hospital's fluorescent lights hummed with a sterile, lonely energy at 3:00 AM. Hiro, his clothes still smelling of smoke and antiseptic, stood before a flickering vending machine in the East Wing. As he waited for his coffee to drop, his gaze drifted to a dark shape draped over a plastic chair in the hallway.

His breath hitched. It was a tailored, navy wool coat—Yuto's coat. The one that had gone missing during the kidnapping.

Hiro didn't move. He watched from the shadows as a woman stepped out of an empty on-call room. She moved with a twitchy, nervous grace, her eyes darting toward the nurses' station before she snatched the coat.

Is she a stranger? Hiro wondered, his detective brain misfiring from exhaustion. Or is she the 'pregnant' ghost who lured him to the furnace?

The woman didn't head for the exit. She headed deeper into the hospital, toward the restricted pharmacy wing. Hiro abandoned his coffee and followed, his footsteps silenced by the industrial carpet. He watched her slip into a supply closet and emerge seconds later clutching a pre-filled syringe.

She wasn't here to finish the job on Yuto. She was terrified.

The Rooftop

The chase moved to the stairwell. The woman climbed frantically, the heavy wool coat trailing behind her like a shroud. Hiro stayed two flights behind, his heart hammering. He could hear her sobbing, a jagged, rhythmic sound that echoed off the concrete walls.

By the time they reached the rooftop, the wind was howling. The woman stood at the very edge of the gravel-covered roof, the city lights twinkling below like indifferent jewels. She held the syringe to her own neck, her hand trembling so violently the needle grazed her skin.

"Wait!" Hiro shouted, bursting through the door. "Talk to me! Who sent you?"

The woman spun around. Her eyes were blown wide with a frantic, localized madness. She didn't look at Hiro as if he were a savior; she looked at him as if he were the devil himself.

"I know you're chasing me!" she shrieked into the wind. "But I'm never going to give you the satisfaction of winning! He said you'd come for me! He said the follower never stops!"

"I'm a detective! I can protect you!" Hiro yelled, taking a cautious step forward.

She laughed—a hollow, terrifying sound. "Protect me from him? There is no protection from the Architect."

Without another word, she plunged the plunger. A dark, viscous poison entered her system. She let out one final, strangled shriek before her knees buckled. The weight of her body carried her over the low parapet, falling into the dark abyss of the street below.

Hiro ran to the edge, looking down. As he turned to rush for the elevator, his mind raced: Did she think I was the one chasing her? Or did she think Kageyama was right behind me?

The Seizure

The elevator ride felt like an eternity. Just as the doors opened on the ground floor, Hiro's phone erupted in a frantic, high-pitched alert. It was the hospital's emergency pager system for Yuto's room.

Hiro ignored the corpse on the pavement and sprinted back to the ICU.

The room was a chaos of white coats and crashing equipment. Yuto was thrashing on the bed, his body locked in a violent, grand mal seizure. White foam bubbled at the corners of his mouth, his eyes rolled back until only the whites showed.

"Get the Lorazepam!" a doctor shouted. "Clear his airway!"

Hiro stood frozen in the doorway, the scent of the woman's perfume still clinging to his jacket. After several agonizing minutes, Yuto's body went limp, the monitors returning to a steady, fragile beep.

The lead doctor turned to Hiro, his face grim. "Detective, we found traces of an unauthorized neurotoxin in his IV line. It's a slow-acting variant. Did anyone visit him while you were getting coffee? Did you give him anything to drink?"

Hiro didn't answer. He was looking at Yuto's pale, bruised face, then down at his own hands. The woman had been a distraction. The coat had been bait.

The follower never stops, she had said.

Hiro realized with a sickening jolt that Kageyama hadn't been trying to kill Yuto in the fire. He had been preparing the soil for a much slower, more painful harvest.

Chapter 12: The Replica

The Calling Card

The woman’s body was a broken heap on the asphalt, but in the on-call room where Hiro had first spotted her, a ghost remained.

Hiro returned to the room, his breath hitching as he searched the bedside table. Tucked inside a medical textbook was a simple, elegant calling card. It didn't have a name, only an address for an abandoned textile factory on the outskirts of District 10—the very edge of the meridian line.

He didn't wait for the sun to rise.

The factory was a hulking shadow against the grey dawn. From the outside, it looked like any other industrial ruin, but as Hiro circled the perimeter, he saw it: a sliver of clinical, blue-white light leaking through a boarded-up window. It was the unmistakable glow of hospital-grade LED panels.

The Mockery

Hiro entered with his weapon drawn, his boots crunching on broken glass. The air inside didn't smell like rust or oil; it smelled like ozone and rubbing alcohol.

He rounded a corner and stopped dead.

In the center of the derelict floor sat a perfect recreation of a high-end hospital suite. There was a sanitized bed, a heart monitor emitting a steady, artificial beep, and rows of IV drips. But it was the wall behind the bed that made Hiro’s blood run cold.

It was covered in medical records. Yuto’s records.

There were X-rays of his shattered spine from three years ago, detailed charts of his current physical therapy, and even a log of his dietary intake from the last week at the private practice. Kageyama hadn't just been watching them; he had been studying Yuto like a specimen. He was building a nest, a place to keep a version of Yuto that belonged only to him.

A wave of nausea hit Hiro. He realized the seizure in the ICU hadn't been an attempt on Yuto's life—it was an experiment to see how his body would react to the "medication" the Architect intended to use here.

Hiro turned and ran. He didn't look back until he was in the seat of his SUV, flooring it back to the city.

The Empty Bed

He burst into the ICU wing, his lungs burning. "Yuto!"

He reached the room, but the door was wide open. The bed was stripped. The monitors were dark. The space where his partner should have been was a hollow, terrifying void.

"Where is he?" Hiro roared, grabbing a passing nurse by the shoulders. "The man in 402! Where is he?"

"Sir, please!" the nurse gasped, startled. "Detective Yuto was moved. He stabilized quickly after the seizure, and since he's a high-profile patient, he was transferred to a private, high-security room on the sixth floor. He's fine."

Hiro didn't wait for the elevator. He took the stairs, his heart hammering a frantic rhythm against his ribs.

The Hug

He threw open the door to Room 612. Yuto was sitting up in bed, looking pale and exhausted, but alive. He was staring out the window, his fingers tracing the edge of his blanket.

Hiro didn't say a word. He crossed the room in two strides and pulled Yuto into a crushing hug, burying his face in the crook of Yuto's neck. He held him so tightly that Yuto let out a small, startled huff of air.

"I'm glad you're okay," Hiro whispered, his voice cracking. "I thought... I thought I'd lost you to that madman."

He pulled back just enough to look at Yuto, his eyes frantic. He told him everything—the woman on the roof, the calling card, and the mock hospital room in the factory.

Yuto's face went from pale to ghostly white. He looked down at his own hands, his fingers trembling. The realization that Kageyama had a "spare" room waiting for him, filled with his own medical history, was a violation deeper than the initial accident.

"He's not trying to kill me, Hiro," Yuto whispered, his voice trembling with a rare, raw fear. "He's trying to own me. He's waiting for you to fail so he can step in and provide the 'care' he thinks I need."

Yuto looked at the door, his eyes wide and distraught. For the first time, the brilliant detective looked truly small in the vast, white bed. "Hiro... don't leave me alone. Not even for a minute."

Hiro gripped Yuto's hand, his gaze turning to steel. "Never again, Yuto. From now on, the meridian doesn't exist. There's no space between us where he can fit."

Chapter 13: The Meridian's Edge

The Neighbor

Yuto’s discharge from the hospital was a quiet, tense affair. Fearing the vulnerability of their third-floor office, Hiro booked a suite at the Grand Meridian Hotel—a high-security high-rise with keyed elevators and 24-hour surveillance.

As Hiro wheeled Yuto toward the elevator, a man in a long trench coat and a low-brimmed hat stepped in with them. He smelled faintly of ozone and expensive tobacco. Hiro instinctively tightened his grip on the wheelchair handles, his eyes scanning the man’s reflection in the polished brass doors.

"Just a traveler, Hiro," Yuto whispered, sensing Hiro’s mounting paranoia. "Don't let the shadows swallow you."

The Buffet

The next morning felt almost normal. They spent an hour at the breakfast buffet, Yuto critiquing the lack of authentic espresso while Hiro piled a plate high with protein. But as they returned to their floor, the domestic peace shattered.

"I need to head in first," Yuto said as they reached their door. "I need to... take care of my needs. Changing the diapers is easier if I have a moment of privacy."

Hiro nodded, leaning against the hallway wall to check his phone. "Take your time, Princess. I'll be right here."

Yuto swiped his card and wheeled inside. Three seconds later, a sharp, choked-off cry echoed through the suite.

"Hiro!"

The Struggle

Hiro burst through the door, his sidearm drawn, but he couldn't fire. Kageyama was there, standing behind Yuto’s chair, his arm hooked around Yuto’s neck. A serrated hunting knife was pressed deep into the soft skin of Yuto’s throat, drawing a thin, bright bead of blood.

"The Architect always delivers," Kageyama hissed, his eyes dancing with a manic light. "Did you know, Hiro? I was the second lead architect of this very hotel. I designed the marrow of these walls."

Yuto’s breath hitched. "The lead... was Levan."

"Yes," Kageyama smiled cruelly. "Your brother. The genius of the orphanage. You, me, Hiro... we all shared the same soup in that miserable home, didn't we? But Levan was the one with the vision. I was just the shadow that helped him build it."

In a blur of motion, Yuto reached up, grabbing Kageyama's wrist and twisting. The distraction gave Hiro the opening he needed. He tackled them both, the wheelchair flipping over.

The struggle was primal. Yuto was thrown from his chair, a shallow slice opening on his arm. Before he could recover, Kageyama grabbed a heavy ceramic vase and brought it down on Yuto's head. Yuto slumped, unconscious.

Hiro was pinned against the glass balcony door, Kageyama's knee in his gut. "Levan didn't die in an accident, Yuto," Kageyama shouted at the unconscious man. "The car explosion... it was orchestrated. He was the prototype. He had to die so I could perfect the design on you."

The Wheel

On the floor, Yuto's eyes snapped open. The mention of Levan's name acted like an electric shock. He saw Hiro at Kageyama's mercy. He looked to his side—one of the wheels of his chair had been dislodged in the crash.

Yuto grabbed the wheel, his fingers white-knuckled. With a guttural roar, he launched the heavy metal rim. It caught Kageyama square in the shoulder.

Kageyama staggered back. Hiro lunged from the floor, a low tackle that sent them both crashing through the floor-to-ceiling glass.

Hiro managed to grab the edge of the balcony railing. Kageyama, however, fell silently. Twelve stories down, he hit the pavement. The Architect was finally dead.

The Horror in the Factory

Hours later, after the police had cleared the scene, Hiro and Yuto sat in the back of an ambulance. A detective from District 10 approached them, his face pale.

"We raided the factory address you gave us, Hiro," the detective said, his voice trembling. "The one with the mock hospital room."

Yuto looked up, his arm in a sling. "What did you find?"

"It wasn't just a room for you, Yuto," the detective whispered. "They found three other corpses in the back rooms. Men around your age, all with spinal injuries identical to yours. They... they had been experimented on.

Kageyama was trying to find a way to keep a paralyzed person conscious but entirely dependent on external 'stimuli.' He was using them as trial runs before he came for you."

Yuto’s blood ran cold. The orphans. Kageyama hadn't just been a stalker; he had been a butcher, trying to recreate the "perfection" he saw in Yuto’s trauma.

Hiro pulled Yuto close, his grip shaking. "He’s gone, Yuto. He can’t hurt anyone else. We’re going to burn that factory to the ground."

Yuto leaned his head against Hiro, the memory of his brother Levan and the three lost souls in the factory heavy in his mind. The meridian line was finally clear, but the price of the crossing had been higher than they ever imagined.

Chapter 14: The Clearing

The Morning After

The third-floor office felt different now. The dust had settled, the broken window in the hotel was a week-old headline, and the "Architect" was finally rotting in the ground. Yet, as Yuto sat at his desk, his fingers hovered over his keyboard, trembling. Every creak of the floorboards made his neck hair bristle.

Hiro noticed. He always noticed the "meridian" of Yuto's anxiety.

"Client's coming at eleven," Hiro said, leaning against the doorframe with two coffees. "But I got a text. They're running late. Traffic on the bridge."

Yuto sighed, rubbing his temples. "I'm fine, Hiro. It's just... the silence. It feels like a trap."

Hiro set the coffees down and walked over. He didn't offer empty platitudes. Instead, he spun Yuto's chair around to face him. "I know how to get rid of that tension. And we've got that reinforced bed in the corner for a reason."

A slow, devious grin broke through Yuto's worry. "Is that an official HR suggestion, Detective?"

"The highest priority on the docket," Hiro whispered, scooping Yuto up.

The Ritual

Hiro laid Yuto onto the plush, reinforced bed. The sunlight filtered through the blinds, casting golden stripes across their skin. Hiro stripped slowly, his eyes locked on Yuto's, before moving to unbutton Yuto's shirt.

He started at the neck, his tongue tracing the thin, healing scar where Kageyama's knife had once pressed. Yuto let out a ragged moan, his head falling back as Hiro's mouth moved lower, swirling around his nipples until they were peaked and sensitive.

"You're here," Hiro murmured against his skin. "You're safe."

Hiro's hands wandered with a familiar, hungry confidence. He worked his way down to Yuto's pelvis, his fingers tracing the sharp lines of his hip bones. He bypassed the silk of Yuto's boxers, his tongue dipping into the hollow of Yuto's navel before finding the heat of his groin.

The air grew thick with the scent of their combined heat. Hiro took Yuto’s length into his mouth, his tongue working with a rhythmic, wet intensity that made Yuto’s hands tangle desperately in Hiro’s dark hair. Hiro looked up, his eyes dark with desire, before shifting their positions.

He pulled Yuto to the edge of the bed, his own clothes long gone. He guided Yuto’s hands to his own body, letting Yuto feel the solid, vibrating strength of his chest and the heavy weight of his balls. They moved into a tangle of limbs, Hiro exploring every inch—the sensitive skin behind Yuto's ears, the softness of his inner thighs, and the raw, pulsing heat where their bodies finally joined.

The friction was a grounding force. As Hiro drove into him, his pelvis slapping against Yuto’s with a wet, rhythmic thud, Yuto felt the last remnants of the "Architect" vanish. There was only the taste of Hiro’s lips, the salt of their sweat, and the overwhelming sensation of being claimed.

"Say it," Hiro panted, his mouth hovering over Yuto’s.

"I love you," Yuto gasped, the words finally free, spoken into the heat of a searing kiss.

The Client

They were lost in the afterglow, limbs intertwined and hearts slowing down, when a sharp, professional knock echoed from the hallway.

Knock. Knock. Knock.

"Detective Hiro? Detective Yuto? It’s Mrs. Tanaka. I’m sorry I’m late."

They froze.

"Shit," Hiro whispered, scrambling for his pants.

Yuto laughed, a genuine, light-hearted sound that hadn't been heard in weeks. He reached for his shirt, even as Hiro fumbled with his belt. "Tell her… tell her we were just finishing up some… deep-tissue evidence analysis."

Hiro winked, throwing a shirt over his head. "Right. Professional to the end."

He smoothed his hair, checked Yuto’s collar, and opened the door. The practice was back in business.

Chapter 15: The Mirror’s Eye

The Dental Suite

Mrs. Tanaka’s dental practice was a sterile, minimalist space overlooking the bustling heart of District 10. But for the last week, the scent of antiseptic had been replaced by the cloying smell of fear.

"It started with the mail," she explained, her hands trembling as she showed Hiro and Yuto a stack of grainy, intimate photographs of her and her boyfriend in their private apartment. "They came every day until Monday. Then they stopped. I thought I was safe."

She led them into her private operatory. "But the inconsistencies didn't stop. I'm a creature of habit, Detectives. I keep my primary tools in the first drawer. Yesterday, I found my mouth mirror in the third drawer—at the very bottom. Then, my prescription pad moved from my right-hand stand to the table on my left."

Hiro leaned against the dental chair, his eyes scanning the room. Yuto, sitting in his wheelchair, focused on the large bay window that provided a panoramic view of the neighboring office buildings and the narrow alleyway below.

The Red Herring

The investigation hit a wall by evening. They decided to clear their heads, Hiro wheeling Yuto down to a local diner two blocks away. As they waited for their burgers, a group of women at the booth behind them started whispering about a body found in the alley last month.

Yuto's interest was piqued. He rolled over to the manager’s counter, where the owner, Ishii, was wiping down the surface with unnecessary force.

"You know the dentist down the street? Mrs. Tanaka?" Yuto asked.

Ishii’s face darkened instantly. "I don't go there anymore. She pulled the wrong tooth out of my niece’s head—a perfectly healthy molar. The woman is a butcher. I wouldn't step foot in that practice again if you paid me."

For a moment, it seemed like a lead—a grudge fueled by a medical error. But as Hiro talked to three regulars, the narrative shifted. "Ishii-san is all talk," one regular laughed. "But that guy in the corner stool? Twitchy. Always staring up at the dental clinic windows like he’s looking for a ghost."

The Final Deduction

They brought the "twitchy regular"—Sato—into the interrogation room. Sato was sweating, his eyes darting around like a trapped animal.

"I didn't do anything!" Sato shouted.

"That's the irony of it, Sato," Yuto said, his voice dropping into a cold, analytical register. "You killed that man in the alley last month. You looked up and saw her window. You spent a week breaking into her office to see if she had evidence. You moved her tools, trying to be tidy, putting things in an order that made sense to you."

"I was just—" Sato started, then choked.

"You see," Yuto continued, "the reason the manager at the diner hates her is because she has a degenerative vision problem. She pulled the wrong tooth because she can't see properly without specific, high-powered magnification. Tanaka didn't see you in that alley. She couldn't have. But because you were so paranoid, you fixed her office. You put the mouth mirror where a 'logical' person would put it."

"The mouth mirror was always on the third drawer!" Sato barked back.

The silence was absolute. Sato's face turned grey. "She puts it in the first," Hiro said, stepping from the shadows. "But you... you remembered exactly where you hid it."

Chapter 16: The Salt and the Steam

The Rotate

The sun over the Azure Coast was unforgiving. Hiro stretched out on his towel, his tanned, muscular physique glistening with oil. Beside him, Yuto was propped up on a lounger, his designer sunglasses reflecting the sparkling Mediterranean.

"Hiro! Rotate me!" Yuto shouted suddenly, gesturing to his pale, motionless legs. "If I only tan my chest, I'll look like a half-painted statue. The 'degenerate' half needs sun too, even if it doesn't feel it."

Hiro chuckled, standing up to manually shift Yuto's lower body, his hands lingering on Yuto's thighs. The heat was making them both restless, a slow-burn thirst building under the midday sun.

The Sauna

"Let's go inside," Hiro whispered, his voice low and suggestive. "The private saunas."

At the spa, the attendant stopped them. "No wheelchairs inside the heat chambers, sir. The bearings might seize or the metal could burn someone."

Hiro didn't hesitate. He scooped Yuto up in a bridal carry, Yuto's arms instinctively hooking around his neck. Inside the cabin, the steam was thick, smelling of eucalyptus. Hiro sat Yuto on the upper cedar bench, the wood hot against their skin.

Sweat began to bead on Yuto's chest, dripping down to his flat stomach. Hiro leaned in, his tongue catching a stray drop from Yuto's nipple before slowly, deliberately sucking the peak into his mouth. Yuto let out a ragged moan, his hands sliding down Hiro's back to find the heavy, pulsing length of Hiro's manhood.

The intimacy was raw and desperate. Hiro moved between Yuto's legs, his mouth exploring the sensitive skin of Yuto's inner thighs while Yuto worked Hiro toward a climax with his hands. Their breaths mingled in the thick steam, tongues clashing as they pushed each other toward the edge. Yuto's back arched, his fingers digging into Hiro's shoulders, their bodies slick with sweat and desire.

They were seconds away from a messy, steam-filled climax when a shriek pierced the quiet of the spa.

The Joint Effort

"Duty calls," Yuto rasped, though his face was flushed.

Hiro sighed, wrapping a towel around his waist and hoisting Yuto back into his arms. They emerged to find a businessman slumped over a cooling tub. Three suspects stood nearby: a debt collector, a business partner, and an estranged worker.

Hiro set Yuto down on a bench. An attendant draped a fresh towel over Yuto's lap. Yuto, still half-dazed, didn't notice the dampness of the fabric.

"Hiro, pick me up," Yuto commanded. As Hiro lifted him, he paused. "Is this... cum on your towel?"

Yuto's face went scarlet. "Nnnn... No! We didn't finish!"

Then, Yuto's eyes widened. He touched the fluid. It wasn't semen. "It's a joint effort," Yuto declared. "The worker lured him here—that's the source of the fluids. But you," he pointed to the collector, "thinned his blood with drink. And you," he looked at the partner, "laced the resort's silverware with a heat-activated toxin."

"And the wheelchair ban," Yuto added, a sharp glint in his eye. "The manager said it would break the bearings. This toxin contains trace amounts of mercury and lead—the exact chemicals that cause industrial bearings to seize. You all used the resort's safety rules to mask the symptoms of his poisoning as heatstroke. All three of you are guilty."

The Finish

Once the police cleared the scene, Hiro carried Yuto back into their private cabin and kicked the door shut.

"Now," Hiro growled, locking the door and pinning Yuto back against the cedar wall. "About that towel. And the fact that we were interrupted."

Yuto smirked, his hands finding Hiro's waist again, his legs draped over Hiro's arms. "I believe we have some evidence of our own to produce, Detective. And this time, don't stop until I'm shaking."

The heat of the room surged as they finally finished what the murder had so rudely started, their cries muffled by the thick, eucalyptus steam.

Chapter 14: The Clearing

The Morning After

The third-floor office felt different now. The dust had settled, the broken window in the hotel was a week-old headline, and the "Architect" was finally rotting in the ground. Yet, as Yuto sat at his desk, his fingers hovered over his keyboard, trembling. Every creak of the floorboards made his neck hair bristle.

Hiro noticed. He always noticed the "meridian" of Yuto’s anxiety.

"Client’s coming at eleven," Hiro said, leaning against the doorframe with two coffees. "But I got a text. They’re running late. Traffic on the bridge."

Yuto sighed, rubbing his temples. "I’m fine, Hiro. It’s just... the silence. It feels like a trap."

Hiro set the coffees down and walked over. He didn't offer empty platitudes. Instead, he spun Yuto’s chair around to face him. "I know how to get rid of that tension. And we’ve got that reinforced bed in the corner for a reason."

A slow, devious grin broke through Yuto’s worry. "Is that an official HR suggestion, Detective?"

"The highest priority on the docket," Hiro whispered, scooping Yuto up.

The Ritual

Hiro laid Yuto onto the plush, reinforced bed. The sunlight filtered through the blinds, casting golden stripes across their skin. Hiro stripped slowly, his eyes locked on Yuto’s, before moving to unbutton Yuto’s shirt.

He started at the neck, his tongue tracing the thin, healing scar where Kageyama’s knife had once pressed. Yuto let out a ragged moan, his head falling back as Hiro’s mouth moved lower, swirling around his nipples until they were peaked and sensitive.

"You're here," Hiro murmured against his skin. "You're safe."

Hiro’s hands wandered with a familiar, hungry confidence. He worked his way down to Yuto’s pelvis, his fingers tracing the sharp lines of his hip bones. He bypassed the silk of Yuto’s boxers, his tongue dipping into the hollow of Yuto’s navel before finding the heat of his groin.

The air grew thick with the scent of their combined heat. Hiro took Yuto’s length into his mouth, his tongue working with a rhythmic, wet intensity that made Yuto’s hands tangle desperately in Hiro’s dark hair. Hiro looked up, his eyes dark with desire, before shifting their positions.

He pulled Yuto to the edge of the bed, his own clothes long gone. He guided Yuto’s hands to his own body, letting Yuto feel the solid, vibrating strength of his chest and the heavy weight of his balls. They moved into a tangle of limbs, Hiro exploring every inch—the sensitive skin behind Yuto's ears, the softness of his inner thighs, and the raw, pulsing heat where their bodies finally joined.

The friction was a grounding force. As Hiro drove into him, his pelvis slapping against Yuto’s with a wet, rhythmic thud, Yuto felt the last remnants of the "Architect" vanish. There was only the taste of Hiro’s lips, the salt of their sweat, and the overwhelming sensation of being claimed.

"Say it," Hiro panted, his mouth hovering over Yuto's.

"I love you," Yuto gasped, the words finally free, spoken into the heat of a searing kiss.

The Client

They were lost in the afterglow, limbs intertwined and hearts slowing down, when a sharp, professional knock echoed from the hallway.

Knock. Knock. Knock.

"Detective Hiro? Detective Yuto? It's Mrs. Tanaka. I'm sorry I'm late."

They froze.

"Shit," Hiro whispered, scrambling for his pants.

Yuto laughed, a genuine, light-hearted sound that hadn't been heard in weeks. He reached for his shirt, even as Hiro fumbled with his belt. "Tell her... tell her we were just finishing up some... deep-tissue evidence analysis."

Hiro winked, throwing a shirt over his head. "Right. Professional to the end."

He smoothed his hair, checked Yuto's collar, and opened the door. The practice was back in business.

Chapter 15: The Mirror’s Eye

The Dental Suite

Mrs. Tanaka’s dental practice was a sterile, minimalist space overlooking the bustling heart of District 10. But for the last week, the scent of antiseptic had been replaced by the cloying smell of fear.

"It started with the mail," she explained, her hands trembling as she showed Hiro and Yuto a stack of grainy, intimate photographs of her and her boyfriend in their private apartment. "They came every day until Monday. Then they stopped. I thought I was safe."

She led them into her private operatory. "But the inconsistencies didn't stop. I'm a creature of habit, Detectives. I keep my primary tools in the first drawer. Yesterday, I found my mouth mirror in the third drawer—at the very bottom. Then, my prescription pad moved from my right-hand stand to the table on my left."

Hiro leaned against the dental chair, his eyes scanning the room. Yuto, sitting in his wheelchair, focused on the large bay window that provided a panoramic view of the neighboring office buildings and the narrow alleyway below.

The Red Herring

The investigation hit a wall by evening. They decided to clear their heads, Hiro wheeling Yuto down to a local diner two blocks away. As they waited for their burgers, a group of women at the booth behind them started whispering about a body found in the alley last month.

Yuto's interest was piqued. He rolled over to the manager’s counter, where the owner, Ishii, was wiping down the surface with unnecessary force.

"You know the dentist down the street? Mrs. Tanaka?" Yuto asked.

Ishii’s face darkened instantly. "I don't go there anymore. She pulled the wrong tooth out of my niece’s head—a perfectly healthy molar. The woman is a butcher. I wouldn't step foot in that practice again if you paid me."

For a moment, it seemed like a lead—a grudge fueled by a medical error. But as Hiro talked to three regulars, the narrative shifted. "Ishii-san is all talk," one regular laughed. "But that guy in the corner stool? Twitchy. Always staring up at the dental clinic windows like he’s looking for a ghost."

The Final Deduction

They brought the "twitchy regular"—Sato—into the interrogation room. Sato was sweating, his eyes darting around like a trapped animal.

"I didn't do anything!" Sato shouted.

"That's the irony of it, Sato," Yuto said, his voice dropping into a cold, analytical register. "You killed that man in the alley last month. You looked up and saw her window. You spent a week breaking into her office to see if she had evidence. You moved her tools, trying to be tidy, putting things in an order that made sense to you."

"I was just—" Sato started, then choked.

"You see," Yuto continued, "the reason the manager at the diner hates her is because she has a degenerative vision problem. She pulled the wrong tooth because she can't see properly without specific, high-powered magnification. Tanaka didn't see you in that alley. She couldn't have. But because you were so paranoid, you fixed her office. You put the mouth mirror where a 'logical' person would put it."

"The mouth mirror was always on the third drawer!" Sato barked back.

The silence was absolute. Sato's face turned grey. "She puts it in the first," Hiro said, stepping from the shadows. "But you... you remembered exactly where you hid it."

Chapter 16: The Salt and the Steam

The Rotate

The sun over the Azure Coast was unforgiving. Hiro stretched out on his towel, his tanned, muscular physique glistening with oil. Beside him, Yuto was propped up on a lounger, his designer sunglasses reflecting the sparkling Mediterranean.

"Hiro! Rotate me!" Yuto shouted suddenly, gesturing to his pale, motionless legs. "If I only tan my chest, I'll look like a half-painted statue. The 'degenerate' half needs sun too, even if it doesn't feel it."

Hiro chuckled, standing up to manually shift Yuto's lower body, his hands lingering on Yuto's thighs. The heat was making them both restless, a slow-burn thirst building under the midday sun.

The Sauna

"Let's go inside," Hiro whispered, his voice low and suggestive. "The private saunas."

At the spa, the attendant stopped them. "No wheelchairs inside the heat chambers, sir. The bearings might seize or the metal could burn someone."

Hiro didn't hesitate. He scooped Yuto up in a bridal carry, Yuto's arms instinctively hooking around his neck. Inside the cabin, the steam was thick, smelling of eucalyptus. Hiro sat Yuto on the upper cedar bench, the wood hot against their skin.

Sweat began to bead on Yuto's chest, dripping down to his flat stomach. Hiro leaned in, his tongue catching a stray drop from Yuto's nipple before slowly, deliberately sucking the peak into his mouth. Yuto let out a ragged moan, his hands sliding down Hiro's back to find the heavy, pulsing length of Hiro's manhood.

The intimacy was raw and desperate. Hiro moved between Yuto's legs, his mouth exploring the sensitive skin of Yuto's inner thighs while Yuto worked Hiro toward a climax with his hands. Their breaths mingled in the thick steam, tongues clashing as they pushed each other toward the edge. Yuto's back arched, his fingers digging into Hiro's shoulders, their bodies slick with sweat and desire.

They were seconds away from a messy, steam-filled climax when a shriek pierced the quiet of the spa.

The Joint Effort

"Duty calls," Yuto rasped, though his face was flushed.

Hiro sighed, wrapping a towel around his waist and hoisting Yuto back into his arms. They emerged to find a businessman slumped over a cooling tub. Three suspects stood nearby: a debt collector, a business partner, and an estranged worker.

Hiro set Yuto down on a bench. An attendant draped a fresh towel over Yuto's lap. Yuto, still half-dazed, didn't notice the dampness of the fabric.

"Hiro, pick me up," Yuto commanded. As Hiro lifted him, he paused. "Is this... cum on your towel?"

Yuto’s face went scarlet. "Nnnn... No! We didn't finish!"

Then, Yuto’s eyes widened. He touched the fluid. It wasn't semen. "It’s a joint effort," Yuto declared. "The worker lured him here—that’s the source of the fluids. But you," he pointed to the collector, "thinned his blood with drink. And you," he looked at the partner, "laced the resort’s silverware with a heat-activated toxin."

"And the wheelchair ban," Yuto added, a sharp glint in his eye. "The manager said it would break the bearings. This toxin contains trace amounts of mercury and lead—the exact chemicals that cause industrial bearings to seize. You all used the resort's safety rules to mask the symptoms of his poisoning as heatstroke. All three of you are guilty."

The Finish

Once the police cleared the scene, Hiro carried Yuto back into their private cabin and kicked the door shut.

"Now," Hiro growled, locking the door and pinning Yuto back against the cedar wall. "About that towel. And the fact that we were interrupted."

Yuto smirked, his hands finding Hiro's waist again, his legs draped over Hiro's arms. "I believe we have some evidence of our own to produce, Detective. And this time, don't stop until I'm shaking."

The heat of the room surged as they finally finished what the murder had so rudely started, their cries muffled by the thick, eucalyptus steam.